report for Douglas fir located to the south of house

The Douglas fir is a codominant stem tree with the larger of the two stems at a DBH of 28" and the other stem at a DBH of 10". The root system of the tree has been damaged from past construction and is suffering from root compaction. visibly damaged and decaying roots to the north side of the tree most definitely from the past construction. This is causing the tree to uproot and lean heavily towards the house. Also, where the tree splits into two stems on the trunk there are signs of bark inclusion. This creates a point of weakness and is prone to fail. This tree is a hazard to any structure or people nearby and is a threat to the home. I highly recommend this tree for removal.
